JOB MARKET PAPER	[1] Ma, M.D. The Organizational Tradeoff of AI Coordination Abstract: Organizations have long coordinated interdependent work through hierarchy, decentralization, and slack—accommodations to the limits of a single mind. AI operates under far less restrictive bounds, making it possible to hand coordination to a single system; the tradeoffs of doing so remain an open question. I study them at one of the world's largest container ports, where a central AI dispatches autonomous vehicles that operate alone (AI-dominant zones) or alongside independent human-driven trucks (mixed human-AI zones). Across 179,925 tasks over 364 days, I compare the zones across three states of the world. In the steady state, AI-dominant zones are more productive, sustaining a more tightly coupled arrangement than decentralized coordination allows. Under recurrent stochastic shocks—mechanical faults—they contain failures less well, though their net productivity remains higher. Under intense and unanticipated geomagnetic storms, unlike anything in the port's experience, the ranking reverses: the mixed zones outperform. A formal model reproduces the central tradeoff in the setting - between steady-state performance and resilience to stochastic shocks. Because organizations are open systems, AI's gains on one performance dimension may come at the expense of another. • Awards (2026): AOM Robert J.
